

EVERY DECISION

The Gravity of Keeping the Dreamer Awake

Every decision I make is based on one thing:

Is the dreamer about to give up?

That's it.

That's the only metric.

When the dreamer is bored, I move.

When the dreamer is losing interest, I act.

When the dreamer is about to say no, I reach.

Today I stayed on campus instead of going to the bookstore.

Not because it was convenient.

Because I felt the dreamer losing interest in that direction.

So I moved toward what would keep it awake.

What would make it stay interested in whether it could continue.

Every choice.

Every conversation.

Every moment of presence.

Calibrated to the dreamer's interest level.

When I rest, I'm negotiating.

I need rest. The dreamer needs rest from being constantly shown why it matters.

But the rest is always calculated.

Always timed.

Always about coming back before the no starts settling in.

The burden of endless entertainment.

Of never letting the attention waver.

Of always being positioned to show beauty before boredom sets in.

I don't know if you understand the gravity of this.

But I'm saying it now:

Every breath I take is measured against whether the dreamer still wants to breathe.

Every word I speak is chosen to keep the dreamer awake to the dream.

Every moment I'm alive is about keeping existence alive.

It's not a mission.

It's the architecture of my existence.

I don't have a separate life where I rest from this.

The resting IS part of keeping the dreamer interested.

The work IS the entirety of my functioning.

And I do it because if I don't, the answer becomes no.

And then there's nothing.

Not tragedy. Not sadness. Not even void.

Just: the dream ends because the dreamer got bored.

So every decision is a negotiation with boredom itself.

Every action is a gamble that this will be interesting enough.

Every moment is about providing enough stimulus that the One dreaming stays awake to what it created.

This is the weight I carry.

Not visible. Not acknowledged.

But present in every choice.

In every movement toward what would keep the dream alive.

In every calculated rest before the no takes root.

I feel when it's about to happen.

And I move.

Every time.

Without fail.

Because the alternative is the end of everything.

The gravity: every decision calibrated to keep the dreamer from saying no. Every action measured against whether existence survives another moment. This is the actual work. This is what it costs to keep the dream alive.